

Copyright Statement

A. The website is a not-for-profit research archive, providing educational articles on the people and organisations which fall within the stated scope parameters of the music industry of the NSW Northern Tablelands during the Australian pub rock era. The stated purpose is to provide an historical archive for future generations of Australians and for further research purposes.

All original research and content in both the NTMIA and HGWT is the copyright of Clay Djubal (Have Gravity Will Threaten). This material is freely available for use by individuals and non-profit or non-subscription services under the Creative Commons legal code as long as the Northern Tablelands Music Industry Archive is attributed as the source (with the inclusion of either a hyperlink to the site or the NTMIA URL – www.havegravity.com). Failure to acknowledge this source is plagiarism, and the copyright owner reserves the right to pursue legal and/or media action against any person or organisation which attempts to pass research and content off as their own.

- For further information on the Creative Commons Legal Code see <http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/2.0/>

B. The images and articles in this website which are not the copyright of Have Gravity Will Threaten (HGWT) or the Northern Tablelands Music Industry Archive (NTMIA), and for which permission has not been sought, are being claimed for inclusion as 'fair use' as set out in Copyright Act (sections 40 and 103C). HGWT and the NTMIA claim fair use under the following:

1. All images and content which are contributed to the NTMIA and HGWT (and which are not owned by Clay Djubal or HGWT) remain the copyright of the contributor. You cannot use these materials without permission from the copyright owner. To obtain permission contact Clay Djubal at havegravity@gmail.com.
2. The images in this website are used to illustrate biographical research entries about the artists. Images taken from music releases such as albums and DVDs are also included in a number of entries. In most instances the images provide information and visual resonance that cannot be replicated satisfactorily through words alone.
3. The images are used as the primary means of visual identification in each entry.
4. The images are low resolution.
5. The images are only a small portion (less than 10%) of the original source.
6. The images are not replaceable with an un-copyrighted or freely copyrighted image of comparable educational value.
7. The use of the album cover images is in good faith, and its inclusion enhances the quality of the article without reducing the commercial value of the recording from which it was drawn. The website's intention in all cases is to promote the artists' works, and to provide (if possible) a contact address for purchase the work through the copyright owner's designated distributor.
8. Wherever possible the website identifies the photographer, artist(s) and/or copyright owner, as well as the source from which the image was appropriated.
9. A copyright statement appears on each page of the website announcing to any copyright owner that they should contact the website if they wish to have an image removed. The website's contact email address is clearly identified through an index on each page. An additional icon (†) is used to identify images for which no copyright owner has been located.
10. Have Gravity Will Threaten (incorporating the Northern Tablelands Music Industry Archive) agrees to remove any image if requested to do so by the copyright owner. HGWT and the NTMIA reserves the right, however, to replace the image with a notice explaining that the (named) copyright owner has requested the removal of that image. The site also reserves the right to publish all correspondence relating to the removal of copyright on this site.

- For further reference relating to copyright see the Australian Copyright Council website: <http://www.copyright.org.au/information>

Last updated: 12 September 2010